Underserved and at-risk communities in Pennsylvania have seen a direct benefit from nonprofit organizations. More than $3.1 billion was secured by nonprofits which went to aid those living in poverty, with disabilities and to serve other populations, according to the National Committee for Responsive Philanthropy.

"This report shows the supreme value that these organizations bring to communities in Pennsylvania," said NCRP executive director Aaron Dorfman.

"The nonprofits often work with shoestring budgets to help and give voice to those people who are overlooked by the system," he added.
