NCRP LOOKS AT CREATING IMPACT

Foundations' funding for community organizing and advocacy, and critical role of nonprofit leadership

WASHINGTON, D.C.—The National Committee for Responsive Philanthropy (NCRP) released today its new report, Creating Impact: Foundations' Funding for Community Organizing and Advocacy.

"Foundations traditionally have shied away from supporting policy advocacy and organizing," said Aaron Dorfman, executive director of NCRP.

In the lead article, Christine A.W. Doby, a program officer for The C.S. Mott Foundation, writes about the importance of foundations supporting community organizing and advocacy.

In an interview with NCRP, Arlene Reich, president of the U.S. Open Society Foundations, discusses the importance of foundations supporting community organizing and advocacy.

Gary Snyder, managing director of Nonprofit Imperative, shares his views on how the charitable sector can better support community organizing and advocacy.

Finally, Aaron Dorfman, executive director of NCRP, offers his list of the best and worst about the current state of foundations' funding for community organizing and advocacy.

Free to NCRP members, Creating Impact is also available to non-members for $25 annually. To become a member, visit www.ncrp.org or contact Yna Moore at ymoore@ncrp.org.

NCRP is a national watchdog and research organization that promotes philanthropy that serves the public good. For more information, visit www.ncrp.org or call 202-387-9177.
